

Summer of '61

It was during the days of Camelot in D.C., an era of youthful leadership and young followers who sought answers to the challenge, Ask not what your country can do for you, but ask what you can do for your country.

For a college student, a summer job on Capitol Hill filled gaps flanked by youth and adulthood, leaving home and learning about new things, gaining experience and knowing how to use it.

It was a time for learning responsibility, having money to spend and needing to save, of meeting new people and being cautious of strangers, of experiencing romance, heartbreak, laughter and tears, holding on, letting go.

Words enlarged the world. Correspondence between Congress and constituents, House and Senate debates, speeches by foreign leaders—all prompted conversations, considerations, and the formulation of personal opinions.

On July 4th, fireworks framed Washington Monument while a military band played Stars and Stripes Forever.
As red, white, and blue flares lit-up the sky, that moment epitomized the entire summer, when patriotism became more than a hand-over-heart pledge of allegiance.

Linda Banks

That Day

(November 22, 1963)

As if we need to be reminded, we are reminded anyway, of that day. Everyone old enough to remember, remembers well, details etched in every window looking back.

A college senior, I walked across the campus, my penny loafers stirring up dusty leaves.
I barely noticed, lost in dreams of the future.
And while I dreamed, the world went haywire, and nothing, nothing would ever be the same.

Inside my dorm, girls huddled in small groups.
Many cried; others stood in silence near TVs, while newscasters repeated the horrific details over and over... President Kennedy had been shot!
Disbelief was etched on everyone's face.
How could this happen? And right here in Texas?
Here, where our dreams were about to come true.

My first afternoon class was Business Statistics, a requisite for graduation, the only reason I endured endless meaningless discussions of means, averages, and medians. But that day we talked about the news.
There was nothing to say, but nothing else to talk about, until our instructor answered a soft knock at the door.
He returned to tell us that our President was dead.

For a long moment, the room filled with silence.
I stared through a long row of windows, trees outside still spilling their leaves, as if nothing had changed. From the day's shock and sorrow, we were thrust into a realm of callous reality, stunned by our professor's mocking rhetoric,
"I wonder what will happen to the stock market?"

Barbara L. Berry

JANUARY MOON

Enormous orange moon hovers on the horizon contemplating his ascent to stardom.
I want to leap out touch the surface join his orbit of Earth.
I want to bathe in bubbles gurgling from the Galaxy, observe my reflection from the light of Venus, free-float among the planets.
I want to search the Moon's surface for remnants of history, find the footprints of Buzz Aldrin, listen for sounds of water and life.
I want to breathe in Creation, and at curtain call, I want my spirit flung out among the universe, a new star just waiting to be discovered.

*Barbara Lewie Berry©
June, 2010*

Published in Moon, The Eighth Continent, An Anthology of Space Poetry, 2011

Barbara L. Berry

ANCIENT VOICES

Deep within the darkness of this mysterious rusty land we wait, Kavita and Koco, lone survivors of the ancient floodwaters that once covered the terrain, carved the craters, sculpted the carbonate canyons, then receded into a frozen sea.

One by one the missions come – sophisticated scientific machines bearing names like Spirit, Opportunity and Curiosity – seeking answers; these dedicated explorations fueled by infinite ideologies and personal passions.

Each expedition comes closer, diligently harvesting new clues, measuring, probing, reasoning, while we – trapped in the debris of this hollow exiled life-form – wait patiently for our redemption.

Persistent Earthling intellect holds the key that will eventually unlock the secret to our fossilized existence.
Whatever is – has already been... what will be has been before; and therein lies the solution to a new world and a new society.

Barbara Lewie Berry©
July 30, 2012

(Quote from Ecclesiastes 3:15)

Published in Mars: The Next Frontier, An Anthology of Space Poetry, 2013

WHAT LIES BEYOND

The box is heavy – filled with keys to doors of our past, doors that define who we were and where we have been.

Keys that unlocked doors to a childhood home, our first apartment, and homes we sadly sold after our parents died.

Keys to doors of the buildings that housed our careers, stored our excesses, protected our RV and boat.

Keys to doors of vehicles we drove – Volkswagens, Cadillacs, Dodge trucks, and Ford station wagons.

Keys to doors of hotels – Rooms 333, 805, 123 – from forgotten locations in unremembered years.

These many keys represent doors through which we have entered and eventually left. Now, in these retirement years, what lies beyond the revolving door of aging and infirmity?

Is there a key that will unlock the door of memory loss and open the door of happiness and joy we once had?

Surely – here in this heavy box – there is one slender golden key that will open the precious door of your mind and allow me to see the real you again.

*Barbara Lewie Berry©
April 30, 2012*

Published in A Galaxy of Verse, Spring/Summer 2012

The Price of Principle

The curdle of blackening bloodshed filled the room.
The tang of rotten iron struck her nose.
She could have stayed behind, but, No, she chose To enter the abattoir, rank with gloom:
“I’m honor-bound to see what I consume.”
The noxious reek infected all her clothes.
The curdle of blackening bloodshed filled the room.
The tang of rotten iron struck her nose.
It clung, as breath from some malignant tomb.
She couldn’t blot its stench by chanting “rose,”
Or “fresh-baked bread,” “new snow,” or “baby’s toes.”
As she recalled the slaughter house, its lowing and its spume,
The curdle of blackened bloodshed blossomed in every room.

A Thank You Note for a Box of Berries

Holy objects: when placed upon the tongue
And crushed, berries yield up all their savors.
Our mouths respond as if sliced by razors.
We sip at wines like those a press has wrung, taste both mature reds, whites, sparkling and young.
We parse the proffered sweet meats for their flavors:
(Holy objects, when placed upon the tongue).
When crushed, berries yield up all their savors,
And purple marks each mouth the fruit has stung
With its sharp sizzle and its sweet quavers.
Thank you for the kindness of this favor We shared your treat with those we live among:
Holy objects, when placed upon the tongue.

Silk

Silk swathes my body in sensation.
Silk embraces, slithers, grazes, sings.
It infiltrates the places perfume clings.
It tempts, then conquers hesitation,
It licks me with anticipation.
Again it whispers its flirtation.
Silk swathes my body in sensation.
Silk embraces, slithers, grazes, sings.
Though it may call for conflagration,
As the burn of yearning stings and stings,
And leaves my hopes but scorched, unraveled strings
As I beg for immolation,
Silk swathes my body in sensation.

Donna Bowling

Window View, Chisos Basin, a.m.

Weighted by stillness, cool, clear air caressed me.
Even the birds seemed to hold their breath when God offered a morning rose as clouds above the mountains.

Silence seeped into my soul like rain into the parched, Texas landscape.
The quiet lifted my spirits on wings of hope, as I breathed peace deep into my spirit, respite from life's blows, time to catch my breath and regain my balance.

Kairos time, holy time, Sabbath, set apart from daily demands, time to remember whose I am, face the unknown future, renew my strength and gather myself to soar with eagles.

Window View, Chisos Basin, p.m.

The mountains listen, contemplate eternity in wordless prayer.
Even the breeze passes without sound, a sigh too deep for words.
My heart stills, breathes. Without words, I do not know myself.

I return to the time before speech, when I communed with God without effort, my heart beating in tune with the center of the universe.

My pulse slows, finds its original rhythm.

In the Window of the Chisos Mountains,
I recognize God's gap-toothed grin,
And my heart responds with joy.

November 6, 2012

Donna Bowling

Dust to Dust

“For he knows how we were made; he remembers that we are dust.” Psalm 103:14

A star implodes. Debris scatters through time across vastness of universe and space.
Dust to coalesce into enzyme, amoeba, and fish in a dance of grace.

Dispersed by God, clouds of holy stardust are building blocks to fuel life’s creation.
Spoken into being, we are then thrust into a race to discover our salvation.

Though we will return to dust, we are yet a reflection of God, creatures of light, light we forget in our life’s daily sweat until the moment our souls take flight.

We sparkle on high and shine with the stars, to live with God in a heaven made ours.

October 8, 2013

Cassy Burleson

ON BUILDING AND REMODELING

I want a house with windows everywhere
So we can reach out and touch each other Whenever we want to. So I can feel As close to air and earth and water as I do to you.
And as close to sky as I want you to feel with me.

A place where, when I really want to be myself, I can be myself in the same space with you and not have to hide in closets To find solitude. And as for other rooms, a burst of emerald green there Where sun can blaze on me like the wizard of "ahs" you are, Light strong and pure, with fuel for health and hope and moonshine.

And as for doors, I've always wanted Enough doors to escape when I felt like it, And enough exits so you can leave me If you wish. Here. Or there. Either way,
You will always have a worn and cozy spot in my heart's fireplace.

And as for floors, I want the floors to be As warm to my touch in winter as you could be --
And as light to my touch as you are in a summer creek -- And half as soft as silk will do as well ...
With tiles laid in as beautiful a pattern as I am in your arms.

And as for paint on walls,
I want no walls between us,
And paint Is such a simple thing
As can be left to taste.

Cassy Burleson

Time Travelers

Lime and salt in our wounds Tends to purify us, overall, Tears are the molten metal That makes us pure

Or more pure than we would have been,
Overall, given just bliss, as far as I can tell, Having only been here and suffered only so much,
Only so briefly ... so far. But it's nearly killed me ... overall.

And so far, it's clear I've learned so little about that stuff which purifies,
But you, my treasured friend, have been instrumental in my education
This year, so I am ever-grateful for heroes such as you Who have really suffered and can still talk about it.

I talk little, squirming in my self-absorption, trying to be more than this, Rebellious – but fist rising – and hoping for a better tomorrow for us all while Thinking about rain on a tin roof from a Gulf squall, the sound of the surf rising ...
And erasing the rest ... as best we can.

Cassy Burleson

Transfiguration (i.e., a complete change of form or appearance into a more beautiful or spiritual shape)

Probably was still drunk on lust ... but never started out with prayers. Especially just after midnight.
Yes, everything happens for a reason ... your sunrise prayer toward the east like blue mist rising over water.
Landing like butterfly kisses on my Cherokee soul that good morning after. Never, ever ... This awakening ...
And you may never be predictable, Peter Pan. Smarter, deeper, overall. But always my Neverland Man.

Don't misunderstand. It's still my personal stuff, my own idolatries. MY PERSONAL SPACE ... that's sacred.
And I've been carving out my secret inner landscapes and digging in with more precision lately, overall.
Secure in God's question marks. My best friend already lives in the Other World. She'll pull me though if I Need her to. I don't know if I could do that for you. But I'll be on your side here, forevermore ...

Bold prophet, oil and flour never running out, giver of life. Do you have a mathematical equation for that?
Relevant research? I'm ... logical, which I never reveal because life hasn't been fair or predictable, Even when I've tried to figure it out mathematically. This must make you a little bit crazy some days.
And when we're beyond now into that naked core beyond us all, well, there we are – back to square one.

But I liked it when you said: "What do you want? We shower together? ... I shower first? ... You shower first?
How do you want to do this?" You're much more confident than I am with your artificially bronzed body, and You have an incredible ... aura. But that question, which may be routine questioning sequence, made me laugh.
And it made all the difference between you ... and the also-rans ... with their patented international pedigrees.

I like having choices and remained in our Gordian knot, watching your eyelashes flutter and feeling deep down still.
And those quiet nuances helped me understand our big differences are first-world questions beyond our prayers .
Your prayers are old and light years before us and Elijah, evermore. Our souls were pasted on before we were born.
And this earth is infinitely old – but still evolving – and that sometimes – most days – scares the Jezebel out of me.

And given our histories, we both may be a "draw," given the power of prayer, even if we don't agree, just loving God's Charity, me ever so grateful for your strange and translucent Noahide ways and your morning prayers. Because without Hearing those prayers, I might have tiptoed away. But after that, if God doesn't love you, then I'm giving up on God Because God is only one shuffle of the deck away on any good Monday morning after with you. (Win, lose or draw.)

Paul Chaplo

Like the Panhandle Roadside

I think we could grow old here Together
Watch the days go slow
Like the Panhandle roadside
In a little town with A silver water tower
And a short name.

Retirement Plans

My retirement will be a third career Maybe I will be a greeter or a meter-reader Or stay home in a fluffy robe and slippers
And put Bailey's in my coffee

Play old country music too loud Until my neighbors call the police And I tell the officer "I'm hard of hearing"

Or maybe I will take my amp
And a generator to the beach And play blues lead lines Out over the lake

Travel around the world On cheap airline tickets That I buy with a credit card That I'll never pay off

And live so That when I die
Even the undertaker Will cry.

How I Learned to Dance

"Put your hand on my shoulder," "Don't look at your feet," Now we're dancing together You're smilin' at me

That's how I learned to dance
With your hand in my mine
I fell in love with you Once upon a time

"Don't run after her,"
"Don't push him away," Now we're movin' together
To the music we sway

That's how I learned to dance
With your heart near mine
I fell in love with you
Once upon a time

Now we're spinnin' together In three-quarters time And I'm countin' the steps Till I make you mine

That's how I learned to dance
Once upon a time
I fell in love with you
Under a Texas moon.

Jane Cheatham

Come Walk With Me

Come walk with me as I make my way, Come walk with me as I fill my day.
Let me share with you the wonders I see,
Let me open your eyes to things that can be,
I can guide you in ways to make yourself whole,
I can guide you in finding peace for your soul.
Come walk with me.

Come walk with me, let me lean on you.
Come walk with me, oh my friend so true.
Listen to me, stay for a while.
Talk with me, bring back my smile.
Dry my tears,
Quiet my fears Come walk with me.

The Shouting Wind

I have chased the shouting wind around my hill
And down into the darkness of the valley Where it came to rest in the trees.
Will he share that rest with me?
Is there room in his haven for another soul?

I have followed the lonely crow in his solitary quest, From where?....
And to where?....
What unknown goal is he seeking?
Where does he wish to go?
I know his quest. It is my quest.
Can he share his answers with me?
Am I worthy?

Jane Cheatham

Darkness

The sun is setting, the darkness is coming.
Quietly, softly surrounding my world.
Covering the ugliness, hiding the grief, Slowly, silently, comforting the earth.
Bringing peace to all people, Stealing away their troubles.
Night--a most accomplished thief.

The dusk creeps over me.
Fitting like a warm cocoon.
Wrapping my being in complete bliss.
Whispering, crooning, the darkness envelopes me.
Speaking to me of the past, Promising dreams of the future.
I can sleep like this.

Marie Berry Dixon

Larger Than Life

It takes little to impress me Just pencil sketch your dreams With cookie cutter clarity Punctuate time and space To hollow out the universe In precise little pieces Hence you humble my existence Laser in to sign the times Pull clouds from their lofty pedestals Lay them wispy on the ground Walk on water
Fly through caves
Bring the universe to its knees
I know you can (copyright by me and to me: Marie Berry Dixon)

circa 1985 new edit 9/9/12

Marie Berry Dixon

Dreamers

Reality
That bolt of lightning that shatters So swiftly and deftly A black appears Juxtaposed against a glowing brilliance
As its laser beam opens a small clean hole That widens and grows like a cancer
To devour the canvas of rainbow painted dreams Of beautiful Camelot scenes with heroes And knights with their always slain dragons Truth and reality lie oft in the eye of the beholder It's spoken of in many languages but no interpreters It's written of in various versions by best selling authors Add disagreeing scientists and historians Truth is bought and paid for over and over With the changing weather of political seasons Truth often becomes too painful or merely too costly Realities chilling wind blows hard against the messenger Freezing him to a full stop Cementing him to his own footprints
As he tries to outrun time Many see reality as a necessity
To keep all dreamers well within the pasture Most think dreamers live a pure and wondrous life Heads floating above the hatred and necessary evils That are the harsh realities of life But most dreamers are battle worn soldiers In tattered blood stained rags Left alone
Crawling through rivers of tears Cutting deeply the many gorges of grief Throughout the land of realities
The only differences among them Is how tightly the dreamers hold onto their banners Yet all in the end are brought down
And when they are no longer able to crawl They fall with a dream in their eye
And a smile on their soul
Copyright by me and to me: Marie Berry Dixon

(new edit 7/10/12]

Marie Berry Dixon

Words

The writer enters a private almost sacred space
It penetrates the membrane of a quiet personal place To illuminate a special point in time With words that take us through Ideas disagreements disappointments and passions And far away from the lure of petty enticements Words can grind a permanent imprint on the soul
They can move and prompt to tell again
To others in future encounters and differing circumstances
As they reach out to distant places Words can water and so replenish Dry crusty corners of the mind Words are sometimes powerful and cannot be dispelled Like morning mist in the harsh realities of day
They can fall as seed reaching fertile soil Touching those ripened to receive Jolting one past a complacent passive place Making bold explorers of the meek Or brighten a mournful heart Awaken all readers and listeners
And so rise above this earthly place Awaken all writers Give voice
As we commit to feast on words throughout the ages

Marcie Eanes

Teaching Knowledge

Third grade was a powerful test
My teacher taught all Illinois city of East St. Louis didn't exist Said my family reunions were held in St. Louis, another city and state across the mighty Mississippi Natural Bridge their link

She dismissed its rich history Founded in 1797, manufacturing proud Once a national Model City storied past includes Al Capone slipping down from Chicago dropping moonshine on East St. Lou's Poplar St. Bridge Speakeasies and hideouts pointed out on tours, Many American contributions too numerous to name

Now sitting in my family's church, a few miles from Missouri, I bid goodbye to my grandmother who missed a century by a year Seeing deep Illinois roots fill each pew Remembering, too, my Dad's talk that third grade eve Naming successes like Jimmy Connors, Miles Davis, Josephine Baker, Katharine Dunham many more But maintaining peaceful strength in the face of arrogance was my father's indelible lesson

Marcie Eanes

Paying Dues

Keep singing and performing in more rooms with more chairs than people Where light and shadows compete for space during frigid winter nights Belt out melodies, act as if hundreds of thousands are squeezed into those tiny rooms Hanging on to your every word...
Forget weariness from numbing job;
you know what's important When stage lights rise, each note sounds richer, fuller Every second the pursuit continues...

Spirit mixes with raw yearning stirred by focused motivation Paying dues adds seasoning not obtained by blind imitation Studying beloved greats, honing skills amid the drudgery, Delivers the best step by step Add versatility's nimble flow Refusing label's limited box and you're ready to soar even more Performing in places beyond your dreams

The mantle gets passed quicker than you think There's always another intently watching struggling to sum up spotlight courage Last performance went horribly wrong chasing The Dream Knees buckled, strings snapped, lines forgotten
What a disastrous mess!
But teacher renews pupil; mental notes are made to learn more Shaking hands the final seal Parting as friends
Both ready to face new challenges

Marcie Eanes

If I Were A Poem

If I were a poem, rainbow colors would mark my trail.
Azure sky paired with warm yellow sun, hovering over a riot of flowers planted firmly in dark, rich soil Music of all kinds would fill the air:
salsa meets jazz, rock meets soul, gospel, meditation.
All notes peacefully co-exists as one in my world

If I were a poem, favorite foods would join experimental dishes just for fun Hang out with exotic drinks for huge parties or quiet reflection Yoga and ballet stretch my mind No stale thinking allowed A few silent gray clouds found in sky hold tears cried, reminders that life has silver linings

If I were a poem, every line would push for better cadences Dorothy and Bennie reside in my veins beside the red, white, blue
The future is mine, more living awaits!
Life's meant for sharing and laughs, more joy after the rain And when that day comes (that one which ends this life on earth), dreams will be fulfilled and cherished memories of those left behind will inspire all along the way

RAIN SHADOW

In an unseen shadow the mountains cast lie these high and rolling plains.
It is not the cooling shade that falls when summits block the hot and drying rays of sun, but a shadow born when mountain ranges seize the winds, strip the clouds of all they bear and send them on, translucent husks of thistle down, to make what spreads five hundred miles beyond, below, this giant land of little rain.

SILENT SYMPHONY

The blacktop highway ran before the headlights of the car, a dark river, beneath a darker sky.

The hiss and hum of road and wheels hushed.
The windshield framed the stage of night.
It began as might a symphony of light with a flickering within a cloud like a candle flame fluttering in a draft behind a curtained window.

Another flicker followed, then another, tempo building, intensity increasing, as if tympanies pounded out the measures until from horizon to the greatest height bright implosions lit the tower cloud with muted colors of the night.

Then in a blare of speed and light an electric bolt of blazing white shot from the cloud and speared the ground.
The distant mesa top flashed to view, a cymbal clash in black and white, before it dashed again to darkness.

The fingers of a hand of lightning breached the cloud, reached and spread across its face to trigger ten, a score, a hundred more, as if brass and woodwinds, strings and drums and cymbals drove the jagged burning cracks from cloud to cloud across the bowl of sky, too many for the eye to count, until in full crescendo the dome of heaven shattered and collapsed into the dark.

A lone flicker fluttered on the horizon.
As if a cello and a single flute played on, the cloud tower slipped apart and drifted off.
Breaking light from moon and stars lit the short grass prairie by the fence where the two-lane blacktop ran before the headlights of the car.

Tricia Ferguson

Wandering Reflections

Here in the clamor is a single ray of light Here in the silence beat a thousand golden wings.
Here in the morning sun, a single burst of thunder.
 And in the darkness, a firecracker.

Here in the mirror blue, a pebble falls.
Here in the eternal stream, an arrow twangs.
Here in the wavering green, a splash, a shimmer.
 And in the silence, a flash of silver.

Here in the drumming rain, a sunbeam flies.
Here in the lathered sky, a mountain crumbles.
Here in the bright green leaf, a ruthless battle.
 And in the rain-bow, a breaking sky.

Tricia Ferguson

The Grasshopper' Ode to the Ant

Because the Grasshopper has a point of view

For Gail, the equipment works,
The coffee pot, the ice machine,
The wheels of society that never,
Never turn for me.

For Gail, with efficiency Can bake a pie or mend a roof.
I have satisfactions, too,
But little built.

I know the rhythms each by name and can discuss the use of each.
I understand the art of rhyme, But Gail can spell.

I reap a harvest sown for me
By Milton, Donne, and Blake. I parse
The passages of time. For Gail,
The work gets done.

Shirley

Shirley, with the snapping, laughing eyes,
Has wicked tales to tell,
Black curls bobbing as she lies.
Shirley almost never sighs,
But she has hurts.

Shirley likes to hear her poems rhymed.
But she gives a mocking answer-- Damning praise. Shirley, for her Every day is timed-- A victory.

Shirley, dancing, trancing through each day,
Has emptiness inside her, too.
When an ebbing, flowing tide of love Almost fills her bay, she Draws back too soon.

DARK SHADOWS

Evening shadows crept slowly across old varnished farmhouse floors, painting his chair in dark triangles.

Sunlight slipped through lace panels tracing splotches on his worn slippers, the elastic in his socks long ago gone, stained rocker creaking as his toes pushed on dusty oval rug. His lips draw in fragrant tobacco, the cold pipe cupped in his palm.

Dark draped all as blackness grew, war-torn ear drums forever dulled depended on dim eyes to tell him when to flip on the lamp.

Light flooded the corner lifting his thoughts, brows arching as he read round lips of family gathering home. Turning his hearing aids up,

Dad shifted in curve-shaped faded calico cushions sewn from his bride's church dress, now plumped by his young granddaughter.

Sun-shapes silently shifted from gold to red, peek-a-booing in what-nots, then disappearing as faces smiled and rocker rocked in carpet ruts.

Vina Hathaway

The Patchwork Quilt

Mom never threw anything away, as everything was recycled for another day.
Socks once darned while stretched over mugs were cut into strips for braided hook rugs.

Calico scraps from dresses sewn new became patches or pockets as little girls grew.
Plain pieces one now and then sees were ovals for worn elbows and knees.

Mom had a way of making fun known as hems were let down and Rick Rack sewn, and Daddy's suit pants with the shinny seat became ladies skirts to wear on the street.

Her fingers were busy and nimble stitching squares with thread and thimble; new ones and old ones, stripes and triangles all pieced together at assorted angles.

The patchwork quilt of memories and charm kept the whole family cozy and warm.
Now spread out, gracing a nursing home, we talk about the love where it came from.

There Was a Flutter

There was a flutter,
A breeze, or was it?
The tiniest bird, just a blur,
A thimble-sized turquoise bit.

A breeze, or was it?
Zooming past my ear,
A thimble-sized turquoise bit.
Air churning near,

Zooming past my ear,
The sound of low buzzing,
Air churning near,
Humming, humming.

The sound of low buzzing,
The tiniest bird, just a blur
Humming, humming;
There was a flutter.

Pat Hauldren

AS A HUMAN

As a woman I can sit idly by while crickets chirp and leaves rustle their applause around a bizarre arena of grass and beer cans defined by the porch light.

As a daughter I recall quieter times of love and strength, of family and smiles.

As a stranger I stare past the sights of a rifle at two men struggling over lost youth, titles, pride and ego.

As a human I relinquish my self pity as I fire at a tin can in the street announcing my decision without pain.

I AM ME!

I am me!
I shout to the stars.
I am me!
Not Podkayne of Mars.
Of blood and of flesh, diverse and complex
I am me.

I am me!
I cry in rebuke.
I am me!
Not a reed in a flute.
Both woman and girl, with heart yet unfurled
I am me.

I am me!
I am growing and grown.
I am me!
In crowds stand alone.
Your grave has flowers, I've built glass towers
I am me.

Pat Hauldren

LIMBO LIES

In the castle dark the shadow lurks Dank walls shelter creatures nocturnal Air as close and thick as fog
A murky bog of stench fills down Below earth's crust where iron clad bones Did rust in days of yore. And Dream I did of a shade smart and canny.
Still it awaits my dream state.
Well hidden beneath seven dream layers I drown.
Each breath is labored.
There is no sound as darkness covets My sleeping form to sift and sap
One lone life.
I flicker, dimmer
My futile flight.
Demon that I loathe.
Have I escaped death?
Have I dared defy the laws of God?
In limbo I float, knowing not which world I rest, Which layer of sleep will hide me best.

Edgar Watkins, Cheese Head

(A Spoon River Poem in Rhyme)

My name was Edgar; I read cheese; friends and I were seers of leaves, then moved to Wisconsin and found the cheese to watch, both square and round.
Tyromancy is what it's called,
I thought it strange, became enthralled.
The art is ancient, old and couth;
the cheese predicts tomorrow's truth.
You look for color, is it deep?
With golden cheese you smile asleep because it means good years for you:
your clan will feed on honeydew.
Coagulation speed gives signs;
slow jells are good; quick shivers spines.
I loved the modern world most times but I still liked old paradigms, and seeing futures rang my bell.
It helped us all when I could tell how our days would be tomorrow, full of joy or maybe sorrow.
I thought that I would write a letter, explaining Gouda, Brie and Cheddar, but when I sliced them up for study my dagger slipped and made me bloody.
Buried with sixteen pounds of Brie,
I met my death quite cheeselessly.

J. Paul Holcomb

Previously published in A Book of the Year, Poetry Society of Texas

J. Paul Holcomb

Queen Anne's Lace

The dainty plants look lovely in spring—flowering doilies, living lace adding culture to my yard.

But once the rains of spring have moved on and the plants mature, decorum is done.
Elegant blooms may whiten yards in spring, but turn fierce in heat. They transform to determined pellets that stick to my dog's fur and to legs of my pants.

I cut them down while they bloom. It's not easy to walk through beauty and whack at innocence.
The plants fall delicately, desecration no reason to abandon good manners.

I feel cruel but I persist.
These delicate flowers become bold hangers-on;
at the end of her reign Queen Anne turns tacky.

J. Paul Holcomb

Previously published in Willow Creek Journal

Sandi Horton

My House of Poetry

Every night as I lay down to sleep Poetry dances in the darkness I close the books but The words magically escape

Poetry lives in my house
I feel it in my body
I hear it in my head
I see in in my dreams

The words are playful
And make me smile
The words are melancholy
And make me cry

I wish the words would be silent
So I could go to sleep
They have so many friends Visiting in my house of poetry

Moving About

The ghosts appear when I least expect them So bright I almost need shades Pure and white and Moving about

Some ghosts make a sound deathly quiet
A ring in the ears like passing out I sense their energy Moving about

Can anyone else see them or hear them
The ghosts in the corners
 I know Unexpected guests wherever I go Moving about

Sandi Horton

Another Perfect Morning

Sky of blue with half a moon Mantras of bird songs Racing squirrels finally rest Another perfect morning

The sun on my face
The earth under bare toes
The breeze caresses my skin
Another perfect morning

An old dog sleeps serenely Another dog delightfully digs
Two dogs tug on a branch
Another perfect morning

I feel contented, Reverent, enchanted, And thankful for Another perfect morning

Phil Cade Huie

Kitten Magic

Gentle the kitten knows Secrets of softness Burrowing cuddles Tiny nose dampness Quiet breath dusting My skin with her warmth Featherweight trusting Asleep in my hand.

And then a purr trembles
The tiny heart dances To pulses of music Only cat souls can hear Pink tongue curls yawning A dream twitches whiskers Clinging paws hug me And peace tender descends.

Going Blind

Stars once glittered Like fireflies, gold-bright Before this cruel foggy cloak Erased all traces of the light And snuffed out the candle flames Of night

Buried alive, I struggle
As a heartless ebony blanket Gently lowers over me Pressing icy hands against my face To absorb my tears
With promises of oblivion That will replace the fragile gift Of vision

I miss your eyes, whose burning stars Have melted into velvet gray;
Like a watercolor in the rain Remembered beauty is washed away.
Dewshine no more sparkles Sunsets fade and die
And my creative heart lies weeping For no longer can I see And no more can I rely On memory.

Phil Cade Huie

Moon Voyage

She led our slithering steps from the ooze
As we strained toward her silver light, Liquid blood guided by her power Through endless millennia of night;
We were helpless against the slow rhythm
Of her relentless celestial song Like ocean tides whose dance she designed We worked with her and learned to be strong To ease our fears of night's darkness Her light spilled through narrow cave doors
She gave us the courage and curiosity To venture forth and discover new shores.
She pulled herds across lands for us to follow,
She heard humanity's first baby's cry Mapped stone rings into the first calendar Taught tribes to travel with eyes on the sky,
She shaped our first tentative ceremonies
To celebrate hunters come safe home again And steered our eyes to the cycles of harvests, Watched us plant the first kernels of grain.
She's shed light to illumine our visions From the start she shaped dreams into form Gave us company through long hours of darkness And hope for an end to the storm.
She's taken a thousand names of the goddess, Wears the fecund light of Hathor's crown Is the deity of childbirth and healing
And the resurrection in Isis's palm.
She transmutes the sun's golden energy Into an enchanted light of her own Emblazoned with legend and mystery
She rules the darkness of night alone
She has inspired the hearts of lovers
With her own tale of marriage to the sun, Seduced our souls to believe in love's magic Taught us to hold hands and move as one;
And as years take their toll on our bodies,
She softens the lines in our faces Keeps sparkles alive in our eyes And gentles time's earthly traces.
Now through darkness and danger we've flown
To lay daring hands on her distant face Leaving human bootprints forever imprinted
In her flesh, to prove our embrace,
As a promise of explorations to finish Dreams fulfilled and encounters to come,
We have traveled from ocean to orbit,
From mud to the mirror of the sun.

Catherine L'Herrison

At the Kite Festival

Shaped like a big bat, the bluish-black stunt kite with long red tail climbs, swoops, dips, and dives before gyrating in giant circles.
Spinning faster and faster in ever increasingly smaller circles, the red tail becomes a lariat that lassos the sky.

She watches him in the open field, observes his hands, the subtle motions that control the dual lines, makes the kite do his bidding.
She remembers when they first met, how quickly the small things he did set her emotions spinning faster and faster, until her heart strings spun in circles, entwined her heart, bound them together for life.

Published in A Book of the Year 2013 by the Poetry Society of Texas

Catherine L'Herrison

In Minnesota Again

for Linda

Rushed, we didn't have time for her to pose for a photo where I really wanted to take her picture, but in my imagination, I envision her there—she, smiling, with her premature snow-white hair glistening in the light, white blouse with blue trim, blue slacks, white sandals, standing in front of that tree so full of white blossoms, it had no room for leaves.
Although no photo was taken, in my mind's eye, I see her—my poet friend, who like that tree, has blossomed.

Published in The Earth Still Turns by the Brown Bag Poets

Plant Sale

When I went out this morning,
I spied a lot of males.
They were waiting to enter the gate at one of my neighbors' plant sales.
But I couldn't understand why there was such a line, and what the draw could be, until I caught a glimpse of the sign that said, "Naked Ladies For Sale." *

*Naked Lady is another name for Spider Lilies

^{1st} place printed in 2011 Encore by the National Federation of State Poetry Societies, Incorporated

Reprinted in The Earth Still Turns by the Brown Bag Poets

Anne McCrady

The Calf Died

Under a moon too full to last, one night past a perfect circle of light, after an afternoon of anguished struggle, we, two women, cow and keeper, working for this long-awaited birth, find our day is done. She lies exhausted in the hay; I am sprawled against the stall. Between us, our shared endeavor is curled: wet, motionless, perfect.

In the hours that have passed, the welcomed burst of February sun has set.
Darkness has overtaken us. The flowers my family gave me for Valentine's Day are fading on the table, the card unopened.
Supper, never cooked. Calls, never made.

Confused by the labored hours, I lift myself, step outside, collapse on the concrete step, as the mother's bawls become a call to prayer beneath my whimpering song.
Looking up, searching for stars, a warm stream of tears fills my ears with the silence of interruption.

Above us, haloed by clouds, the moon too heaves itself up from the horizon, its misty spectral glow rippled in the ridges of the metal barn.
Inside, the cow quiets; the night stills.
Tomorrow there will be more sun, more work.
Tonight I need this step, this crying bench, to ache for all we love that does not live.

Anne McCrady

My Body Takes a Chance

Feet up, torso softly folded into my work-worn sofa, the day drenched,
I am lost in listening to the throb and thrust of my existence, a blood engine pumping seventy-two times a minute inside the wooden cage of my rib-strapped chest.
A piston, muscle-made-machine, my heart pounds out its purpose as a rhythm inside my skin.
It's you, it's you, it's you, pulsates back against fingertips pressed to my thin-skinned wrist.
Liquid percussion in downdrafts of drumming, the real pulse is in the pauses between beats, the uneven gaps when for a puff of time, the flow of life – life! – is suspended, and my body takes a chance that its four flooded chambers will remember what to do and not lapse into the luxury of a fluid daydream...this being the kind of Sunday afternoon perfect for taking it easy:
dishes finished, the kids gone, a slow, soft rain dripping off the roof in an autumn cadence of not now, not now, not now.
Just the sort of day to let my heart take a breather, before I ask it to beat back the world again.

Patrick Marshall

A Tweet from a Twittering, Sweetie

Without a feather anywhere near I received a tweet sweet to my ear.
She sent lust and love thru time and space,
A scarlet hot flash engulfed my face.
No time spent waiting for a letter, Tweets, hot and fresh, are so much better.

In an instagram, thru time and space,
I sent her a smiling anxious face!
My world grew quickly, deathly quiet.
A rising fear or brewing riot—
My wife was just a tad too tweety.
The twit had tweeted, the wrong sweetie.

© 2013 Patrick Lee Marshall
All rights reserved

Published in Galaxy of Verse 2013 Fall-Winter Edition

Fences – Initially Unaware

I built my own fence; totally shut myself inside an escape pod going nowhere. Initially I just wanted some solitude from the frustration of an unwanted move. Time passed and I regretted the numerous walls I had built between me and the world. Encased in a mental and physical battle of wills, I existed; a slug undecided on actions of escape. Desperately wanted to warn others about building fences and the paranoia that easily seeps in, settling debates about walls and refusals to ask forgiveness for foolish behavior.

Years slipped in and out of my consciousness crying for past joys. I finally grew tired, could no longer climb over the fences I had built. Tearing them down took a toll on me, those I loved, and those who loved me.

Sometimes feeling life dictates we must build a fence, make it barbed wire. A chance for a little pain exists, if crossed incorrectly, but you can see and touch those on the other side and with a little help climb over, slide under, or crawl through the wires.

© 2013 Patrick Lee Marshall
All rights reserved

Patrick Marshall

Fires in a Never Dying Garden

In remembrance of Violet Newton, Texas Poet Laureate, 1973

I did not know the Lady and never heard her read, never knew the joy it must have been to sit and talk with her, sharing life and imagination. I have sensed the gratification she must have felt penning such beauty and accepted her sentiments when reading her lingering words, thoughts given and taken in an exchange of love.

She has only passed in spirit, remaining here ageless as emotions she shared. Countless people in the future will discover a simpler place and time when silently reciting her verses in their minds or speaking publically thoughts expressed in timeless verses unraveled through her pen.

And I, a child of poetry, devour the strokes she left on paper trying to digest the essence of charm and character contained, that I might forever remember her contribution to my voice, having enjoyed the sweet taste of her words.

© 2013, Patrick Lee Marshall
All rights reserved

Patsy Mayhan

[Music and Lyrics composed by Rick Stitzel and Patsy Mayhan]

REPTILES & AMPHIBIANS

Ornate Box Turtle

I'm a turtle slowly walking at a crawling pace
If I moved a little faster
I would like to Race!

The Scarlet Kingsnake

I'm a snake that's hiding in the rocks
I would like to crawl into your socks See my skin is yellow, black and red I would like to hide under your bed.

The Blue-spotted Salamander

I am a blue spotted salamander
I like to sleep all day Then when the sun goes down at night
I come out to play
Deep in the forest where I live Life is pretty neat There I have everything I need like snakes and bugs to eat CHOMP!

The Reticulate Collard Lizard

I'm a collard Lizard from the Rio Grande
I am strong and perky Playing in the sand
You might like to catch me
There is just no way
If you try to catch me I will run away
I'm a speedy fellow fastest in the land
I'm a collard lizard from the Rio Grande

The Ornate Chorus Frog

I'm a frog that is hopping down the road Sometimes people think I am a toad
I just like to sing my froggy song Would you like to sing along?
RIB-BIT RIB-BIT RIB-BIT

Jessica Ray

Aida

Silver bracelets cascading down her arms glisten on a bright morning in Petra Jordan's treasure of treasures

Flowing traditional headscarf covers her long dark hair
But that is where tradition ends - western jeans and t-shirt take the day and of course ubiquitous flip-flops

"My name is Aida" she announces in her distinctly Jordanian accent We meet on a dusty road where breathtaking works of art are chiseled from mountain peaks Reaching to the heaven

She is there to sell her wares . . . beguiling as Little Egypt performing her unique belly dance for a Bedouin sheik

In no time she makes me the proud owner of two silver bracelets - a self-appointed tour guide she walks beside me and queries . . .
"Do you have anything from America?"

(I wonder if she could know that centuries ago this city of antiquity was a great trading center that led to the Near East by way of the Mediterranean - No probably not . . . (just wondering) Was the art of selling in her DNA?

Aida sizing me up has something in mind . . . maybe something I am wearing Moments later smiling with glee . . . an oversized pair of sun glasses tilt unsteadily on her nose dwarfing her tiny face (size doesn't seem to matter to her at all)

There is magic here - one of the new Seven Wonders of the World
But there is another magic . . . so enchanting . . . bridging antiquity and the present Selling silver bracelets and flashing her dazzling smile . . . asking
"Do you have anything from America?"

Jessica Ray

Wonder* in the Desert

Once upon a time . . .
on a Pale Blue Dot in space an island appeared on the shores of time

And now from the distant past It suddenly leaps out to shine and dance once again in Earth's ancient drama

A mythical city shrouded in silence and mystery . . . a lost jewel uncovered to sparkle in the sands of Jordan and dazzle the beholder millenia later

Surely an army of artists labored as though they were forming the Earth itself Their blood on fire with the love of creating Carving out astonishing sculpture temples tombs on the slopes of Mount Hor to become poetry in stone

As I wander this path you walked I wonder . . .
 What took you away from this paradise war plunder disease searing hot summers?

A laurel crown to each of you and your untold story Your honor is etched in every stone

* Petra, Jordan, one of the Seven Wonders of the World.

Sue Roberts

Declamation Day by Tom Sawyer

When I was just a young'un Maybe in school a year,
The teacher said some dreaded words That all did seem to fear.

She stood right up one morning Delivered these words of grief, Next Tuesday will be Declamation Day
Some girls began to weep.

Now, I didn't have no idea, see What a dreaded day was to come.
If so I'd had a belly-ache
And kept myself to home,

Then I found out what happens On that declaiming day,
The teacher gives you a paper Showin' what you should say.

It was mostly words of others,
You was expected to recite.
And put some effort in it,
So it would sound just right.

Now here I was a southern boy,
And pretty sure I ain't Never gonna recite no words, Ever spoke by U. S. Grant.

Well, I might recite some words,
Of Bobby Lee or Jefferson Davis
Those sons of the Confederacy That worked so hard to save us.

But if that teacher wants me to say Some words some yankee said, Well, I'll just tell her straight out, I'd just as soon be dead.

If she'll only let me recite Bob Lee, I'll give them something to remember.
The farewell words he spoke that day,
He delivered his sword in surrender.
My fear was realized one day,
She put me to the test.
When in later years she handed me, Lincoln's Gettysburg address.

But I done what any good southern boy would And declaimed it with so much grace Speaking words of a yankee, Won me a blue ribbon for first place.

Jim and Me

The old man and the small boy Were quite a sight to see Such an unlikely friendship Between old Jim and me.

What do they have in common?
People would often say A small boy and an old man Whittling his life away.

We'd sit upon a wooden bench
On the old courthouse square He'd tell me tales, while whittling Of hunting buffalo and bear.

I never tired of listening to his Tales of derring-do Of learning where the doves nest
And why the sky is blue.

He whittled me a pony A blue bird and a dog
And told me why the rabbit Likes to sleep in a hollow log.

He told me tales of bandits
And lawmen strong and true.
How the leopard got its spots
How to make wishes come true.

If I could learn to whittle And tell a tale or two When I am old, I'll find a boy
To share my derring-do.

I'd tell him of my own exploits Over the land and sea But mostly I'd tell him of the friendship Between Old Jim and me.

The Bed of a Pick-up Truck

Some southern men have a ritual.
They practice it most every day.
They all gather round that pick-up truck, Staring in its bed as if watching a play.

What are they looking for, I wonder,
In the bed of that old pick-up truck.
Maybe if they look long enough,
It's sure to bring good luck.

There's seldom much conversation,
As might be expected from men.
After a spell of looking one might say, Ole Bubba's been drinking again.

Upon further viewing of that pick-up bed, Another might venture, that's bad.
He ought to look after his Mama, Instead of his no account Dad.

If a poet sees the world in a grain of sand, Then surely with a little luck,
Them good old boys may see the same,
In the bed of that pick-up truck.

To gaze in a pick-up bed so intently,
Could even be deemed as spiritual.
Perhaps they search for the meaning of life,
As they perform this treasured ritual.

Or maybe they do it just because,
It's something their Daddies did.
After all boys must follow Dad's steps,
From the time that he's a kid.

If a poet lacks inspiration,
And waits by the muse to be struck, Perhaps he could gather with the good old boys, Find salvation in the bed of a pick-up truck.

Conquering the Red Maple

For Lyle, Lee and Dawn

I'd spent the day cleaning up last red maple leaves.
Felt good to work hard.
Felt good to cook dinner, radio on and candles lit, though knowing more leaves would fall.

It's funny, the memory seems so recent, so far away, that Thanksgiving.
I held Dawn in my lap as the swing did its slow drift. The other kids raked and piled those generations of leaves, running, jumping, scattering.

Lee, breathless would come up the steps, climb in the swing with us for a brief rest and a slightly rigorous hug before returning to the leaves, the raking, the running, the jumping and Lyle as he covered himself in fall.

Lovingly, the holiday left behind promises to return.
They do return, Dawn or Lee or Lyle.
Perhaps the leaves and more raking prove the quote, "We have to do the things we can't not do"

Published Galaxy 2013

Letter from Ogden in the Mid-West

My Dearest Frances, Isabel and Lanell:
How great! My daughters have rhyming names.
I may need any rhyme I can find after my welcome in Tulsa and OKC. Hollis Russell, the bookseller, did sell 200 books at his 3-7 soiree, so thus I am writing this with limp arm from shaking hands, shaking hand from signing books, each recipient requesting "just a short, short rhyme with my name" How many different ways can I use "anther and panther" "Driscoll and Episcal"
"Brown and crown" "Doubleday and Hemmingway"? in the swamp of oil barons with only my verse and Free Wheeling to defend myself?

I was rescued by my host and chauffeured
To what I thought would be a quiet dinner And early return to the Biltmore. (Note their fine Stationery.) Not so, a mansion full of guests who parked their oil wells outside, were inside for more autographs and by now the advertised short verse. I was once told: When you do something two times, it becomes tradition. Maybe I can call it An Oklahoma tradition. Tomorrow I greet the Texas Cattle barons. Maybe I should buy boots and chaps with the $51.00 I received for two poems from the New Yorker.

I close with all of the love that keeps me in good spirits
When I know that we will be together in a matter of days, hours and minutes now. I think of you constantly, even the train hums your names, Frances, Isabel, Lanell, Frances, Isabel, Lanell as I retire to my berth.
All, all my love forever plus our five extra minutes.
Goodnight my adorable ones, Ogden

Daddy

p.s. So far no one has asked me to recite Burgess' Purple Cow

p.p.s. One word of advice to my young ladies: Generally speaking, it's better To call older men Mister

Jeannette L. Strother

Wavering Path at the Stone Pavement in Hebrew Gabbatha

“Pilate, therefore went forth again, and saith unto them, Behold, I bring him to you, that ye may know I find no fault in him.” John 19:3

That night my bed was a restless tomb as I wrestled demons in my head.
Torn between duty and conscience
I did not want the night to end.

In my dreams, my hands dripped red with flesh ripped on a pure white lamb.

They said...He raised the dead, healed the sick, cleansed the leper and gave sight to the blind.

Who was I? to stand in judgment of such a man.

I queried...He answered.
I found no fault in him.

I, the Governor for Rome, in Judea had worn a trail from door to room I raised my hands and washed them clean and released to the them...their King.

Leaders roused the rabble, posted the cry, “Release the robber! Barabbas!” I questioned, “What, of this man, Jesus?”

They insisted, “Crucify him! Crucify him!”

Jeannette L. Strother

Winter's Treat

I open my mouth in awe at the low widespread nimbostratus rushing in with a northern blow.
One by one from frigid sky, first a flutter then a flurry and dumps in blizzard squall.
White icy lace of intricate physique, softly to my lips it falls soft and wet and clean.

homage to my hips these hips are big hips they need space to move around in. they don't fit into little petty places. these hips are free hips.

they don't like to be held back. these hips have never been enslaved, they go where they want to go they do what they want to do. these hips are mighty hips.
these hips are magic hips.
i have known them to put a spell on a man and spin him like a top

By Lucille Clifton 1936–2010

pardon me miss clifton homage to my lips

these lips are soft lips they are are a size perfect for my face. they don't need more stain just a ready smile. these lips are warm and brown.
they don't like to frown.
these lips have no lock and key.
they diss who they want to diss they kiss who they want to kiss.
these lips are heady lips these lips are voodoo lips i watched them hex a man to lose himself in a dervish whirl.

Jeannette L. Strother

Susan Beall Summers

Haiku

in silver moonlight fish spawn in feverish whorls life dances in tides

Haiku

grey Monday
I drink my blues with coffee as mourning doves coo

Susan Beall Summers

If I Could Remember

If I were a young child and I could remember all the days of summer which were filled with wonder - riding down that old clay hill, lying in the grass, wishing on stars and finding gold 'neath rainbows, I'd find the sun and make it shine on me and you.

If we were young lovers and we could remember all the ways you touched me and the moments filled with beauty-making love all night long, weaving dreams into stories, and laughing so carefree, I'd find the belief that love can last for me and you.
Yes, it would be true.

And I'd see you as who you are and not who you pretend to be.
The roles you've played, your accolades, the hope that died because you never tried would come alive and become the chance to live your life anew.

If I were a mother and I could remember the miracle inside me growing with so much love-nights of lullabies, holding a sleeping babe, watching so proudly as he grew, the smiles and secrets just for two.
I'd find that place of peace and rest and fill the world with all things blessed.
and there'd be time for me and you.

Sharon Taylor

The Mind of Poetry

Late into the night I read a book of poetry, an anthology of minds that rings with rhyme and some that flow in meter.

Others scatter about the page in merry dance or serious thought.

Some minds speak softly in metaphor or scream in paradox, and the message leaps off the page or hides in dog-eared corners, begging for discovery, pondering, or understanding.

Ideas are squeezed caressed, and smoothed from writer's block until, finally, the pen sculpts from the mind another poem.

Fresh Field Flowers and Old Pottery

I scurry into the kitchen to find coffee made.
A spray of field daisies, still damp from morning dew reclines in bouquet on the breakfast table.
I fill a familiar mug to inhale the aroma of morning.

I pick up a dainty daisy, touch it gently to my face, then place it in an heirloom vase.

One by one, I arrange the flowers, then walk across the room to admire them from afar.
It has been a morning to savor, much like the decades of mornings before.

He is an early riser.
I, a midnight writer, cannot easily succumb to daybreak.

But, we look forward to early dinners, and evening jigsaw puzzles, where we are always enthusiastic about finding the right pieces.

I treasure midnight muses, and sleeping past daybreak, but nothing is so special as pairing fresh field flowers and old pottery.

Early Spring

A thousand branched hands curl to the sky as windows of morning light glow through the limbs of a solitaire tree standing firm in the pasture.
Silhouetted cows gather round the aged old trunk to welcome solitude of a new day.
They do not know that from a distance
I am admiring their leisure.
I wish you were here to stand by me in this early spring mist.
You would feel the beauty I see in each intertwined branch still bare of leaves.
You would hold my hand and say,
"Only God can paint like that," and I would brush my damp hair back to rest my head upon your shoulder.

The Bop Poem

He Does the..... Litterbug

He's a man on a mission, bag knocking at his hip.
So many cans he's gathered his sack's about to rip.
That newspaper ad that blew across the street, he leaned down to grab it and never missed a beat.

I didn't drop it but I'll pick it up!
I didn't drop it but I'll pick it up!

Greasy fast food wrappers are trashy, makin' waste.
There's short order road litter, some hiker dropped in haste.
That chicken in the box is cleaned to the bone.
Out of some car window with a toss it was thrown.

I didn't drop it but I'll pick it up!
I didn't drop it but I'll pick it up!

He thinks to himself that his eyes have never seen those who nightly dump their junk all through this country green.
God bless this busy man. We sure owe him a hug.
This man who daily walks and does the litterbug!

I didn't drop it but I'll pick it up!
I didn't drop it but I'll pick it up!

Carol Thompson

Mother Nature Keeping House

Mother Nature keeping house, blesses final rest.
Her spirited winds wipe clean the chiseled stones.
Her flurries of tender snow polish each monument, markers bearing words of adoration created in love from broken parts of the heart.
Intimate tributes carved with care, sacred work entrusted to crafters never met.
Mother Nature keeping house, love watching over, tucking in with creamy layers of soft moonlight, glazing the earth with radiant warming sun.
Mother Nature keeping house, welcomes rain, sometimes soothing, or driving, pounding to wash away years of dust so scaling, staining that silent dates and sentiments cannot be read.
Mother Nature, keeping house, her visits unending especially to those stones that bear no urn and call no loved ones to place the flowers and stand before to read, reflect, remember.
Mother Nature, keeping house, witness of the fate of bygone stones now vanished.

Carol Thompson

The Nugget

Not silver, not gold, but a story untold,
a poem that yearns to take form.
The poet delves deep and pulls from the heap an idea which springs to be born.

Perhaps it's a word, a phrase overheard, the lightning bolt strike of a theme.
Nuggets come in the night.
The poet must write, so the verse is not lost in a dream.

For past centuries old mankind has been told,
"there is nothing new under the sun."
Has my poem of lore been written before by kindred souls long gone and done?

Mary Tindall

ONE DARK DECEMBER DAY

Remembering Sandy Hook

They tumble out of safety seats:
A line of fuzzy hats and boots With overstuffed backpacks of dreams.
The sunlit path to learning suits

Them. The bell sounds. They take their seats And open joys that overflow From juice boxes of childhood. Rhyme And rhythm mark the rite to grow

And learn. The morning lesson rings.
In ponytails of promise, they Possess the future. Sparks of hope With missing teeth alight its way.

Displays of careful work and play Express their pride and will to please.
Their hearts with trust to spare bestow It freely.

Frames of childhood freeze.

Their school becomes a horror house That day. A monster steals the light And raids their youth. Then leaves behind The dread and doubt of darkest night.

Mary Tindall

THE SIGN OF BLUE

Returning bluebird pairs arrive Afloat on warming trends, align With nature's voice to nest and wait.
In nervous darts of blue, the sign

Of life inside the graveyard gate Appears. They briefly visit stone To stone, reflecting blue of sky
And hope of spring. They build-to-own

The silent space. Its stillness soothes Them. Builders claim the resting place To do their work and raise their young, Exchanging song for keep. Their grace

Surrounds the borrowed grounds where work And worry wane as winds. A stone, Alive with song, proclaims the good
The smallest deed presents. Alone,

A watcher waits inside the gate To catch elusive scenes in view.
In sunlit rites, the grounds receive The gift of spring on wings of blue.

Mary Tindall

My Mother's Voice

Whispers back to me on winter winds:

"Button your coat.

Come home before dark."

Returns me to the ruckus of backyard drama and discipline:

"Don't slam the door.

Say you're sorry."

Soothes me in the patchwork wrap of home:

"Hold my hand.

We'll go together."

Brings me back to long waits on the front steps of regret and change:

"Wait till your daddy gets home."

Repeats the hand-me-down truth:

"It doesn't matter what everybody else is doing."

Quotes from the Sermon on the Mount:

"Treat others the way you like to be treated."

Hers is the voice of the one praying beside the sink in the morning of goodness and hope.

Scott Wiggerman

Missing Persons

That girl whose father walked away from his family, not to be heard from again:

I never thought of my 95-year-old grandmother as that girl,

but here she is, conversing with him daily until he turns and walks off—again.

Through tears she asks, Why would he do this?

I wasn't done talking!
She's confused by his smooth skin, his full head of hair—It's like he doesn't age—never mind that eight decades have passed since he became a ghost.

Last night he was supposed to meet her at the drug store; another day, the park.

Locations change, but one thing is constant:

the turning away.
Rumor was he went west, and now that she's in a home in Arizona, she thinks she might find him.

She may be closer than any of us can see.

Poor Poet

starting with a Dickinson line (#224)

I've nothing else to bring, you know, so I keep bringing these.
Some wishes are lies. I know—for years I've been stringing these.

A scrunched-up piece of paper and a pen in my pocket.
I always have a line. But groceries? I'm winging these.

Dappled patterns of light across the vacant boulevards.
Leaves overhead, a chorus of green, softly singing These.

Street by street, door to door, a practice in misery.
No one answers doorbells. I know, I've been ringing these.

The words do not belong to me, and yet I claim them.
Hush, tender: soothing. Acrid, guilt, fester . . . stinging, these.

I keep looking up at dreams through the trees. Where do they go?
Only so much can be carried: keeping those, flinging these.

Out of One's Element

A leaping fish—not large—suspended in the air for seconds like a skier off a jump, before returning to its own environment; an acrobat, as if this shimmery flash in the sun were planned, this gorgeous arc its last hurrah. You dove into the water once, so deep the end seemed near, but isn't that a buzz like love?
You surfaced in a panic, out of breath, but happy to have lived, the air a gift you've not forgot. The fish, back in its bath, swims low, but sees that glow above, a theft remembered in its bones, and you recall the water's snare, its depths as dark as coal.

Thom Woodruff

IN A LIFE OF COUNTED BREATHS

Some will be Significant. We will recall what someone said-whether in wisdom or in foolishness/in a manner that refreshes like a fountain in the city or a spring in hidden deserts or the generous advice /support some elders bring when they choose to act as children. Example is everything Long ago, i gave away beliefs. Left them like money beside a Sacred Well for others to pick up if they need. (we all need something/and hunger comes in many forms). Now, sans certainties, i feel @ease in a world of uncertain changes. There ARE "powers beyond our understanding" More than death ,taxes and poor public transport. Because i do not know them all This is why i write tonight-in trust you will enlighten via response..

WHISPERED CONSOLATIONS

if you have seen something no dreamworlds could utter if you have been where no one could follow if you have been told secrets that kill there is still tomorrow and today's gift is choice-free range ,herd,organic,individual you range across its broad prairies past piles of ghost dancing bison alongside fenced fields and railroad certainties past washed out bridges for which there is no warning and your future always invisible cats/blinking eyes in a darkness punctuated via stars and this momentary memory's undecipherable hieroglyph

Thom Woodruff

HOW DOES LOVE START ART?

Via look in eye that meets one's mirror by speech bridges to auricles within ears Hands that hold,cuddle and caress Legs that walk alongside and towards Whole bodies of energetic commitment to another/who responds in ways diverse and independent.Once upon a page over distance conquered via postage epistolary connections affirmed such as when close needed no such contract.

Assurance,supplication,petition,affection found clothes in words that drew love out and were held for years as lovers might not meet in flesh/hence letters meant depth and sustained relationships.Now we are connected No one has time-for more than text or Tweet Acronyms and smiley faces.Even when face to facebarely as close as mobile devices.Once-long letters Now-short romances.Is the real relationship-with language/expression?Write to me..

WE HAVE TWO LIVES

One-when we enter this world ,dancing womb wet ,cute as a button Entrancing all via miniature size and skill sets.Elders fawn upon us.
We grow in the light of their black and whites as we burst into colors warmed via praise.We recall/remember the best of these beginnings as we dance and sing in our beaming.Harmony rings through us.

In dotage,we seek service-to help others.Divest our pasts or use them as currencies-to exchange for a betterment for all.
Here is when the call of your life is heard twice-to reinforce the brightness of youth via the autumn strength of knowledge

So we remember both Shirley Temples-one who danced and sang
The other who served selflessly as we aged.She was always young.

Patrick Wright

Whence Coffee

About the ninth one hundred years, among the hills of Kaffa, Kaldi kept his goats.
Each year, young Kaldi watched his herd consume red berries from a little shrub—and dance.

The dancing goats of Ethiopia gave Kaldi wonder what the bitter fruit might do if he should chew, and so he did.

Ebullient, Kaldi gathered for his priest a handful of the berries meant to share.
His holiness into the fire did throw these vile and wicked fruits of bitter sin.

The aromatic burning stock left seeds which Kaldi raked into a pot to save.
He ground them down and boiled a piquant brew.

So, this he shared with family and friends for health, then wealth, as came from miles around the traders, brokers, rulers and the rich, all wanting to partake of Kaldi's cup.

The dancing goats of Ethiopia,
from Kaffa hills, for humankind, did cause in roundabout, a drink—our Kaldi's boon.

Impaired Pitch

Tinnitus sings unceasing songs to only me, crescendos, fortes no one else will ever key, discordant arias that roil in constant blare accompanied by common sounds I hardly share.

Patrick Wright

The Lyric Eye

I live not free writing this poem nor when making love or picking a flower to watch unfold.
 The late summer bloom orange and brown sitting atop a single-stemmed shoot on the green field of a lawn calls me over to call others.
We each see a different blossom opening in the same green field by delving inside to see out: Each soul reaches back into self before time inside the womb, before that seminal date—conception back through the passion, into that early meeting of another man and woman blind in sin—hot skin hungry with seeded desire, reaching in rhapsodic arch.
 Thick clouds burst free for flashing, crashing epiphany.
 Thus we strip our bodies, an exposure in order to connect each revealed self, tightening the tone, relying on the bone marrow—the male part flowing through the female, like that original bone, but now more like eyes seeing through fallen leaves the bud scars of spring.

June Zaner

...navigating Cibolo Creek.....

© by June Zaner, February 25, 2014

Back then, some time ago, the Cibolo ran wide and deep And fast through stone canyons where strange mountain cats Came to drink and were swept away.....we know, we see their bones In fossils from that time, lodged perhaps upon some cactus root Or in buried pock-marked stone, uncovered now as secrets are Laid bare.....the toads and fish and wild things we cannot name Caught in the middle of their love-making perhaps and engraved Like carvings on a tree....."salamander loves salamander" forever And ever.....until what was for them the end of time.

And, just so, we wander through those long ago love nests in our trail boots and with a stick turn over the notes they left us.
Maybe it was without intent but the lesson remains, water washes, dust blows and the Cibolo keeps its own path gentle and sweeping over land now dry most years, or in a torrent of anger, swollen with a rage out of control. The river-bed is consumed and then laid bare again, like a lover who has lost interest and gone to bother someplace else, it is that way with people too, I understand.

my scrapbook...

© by June Zaner, June 3, 2011 deep into my paleography, I studied the stick figures, the enormous sunflowers, the house with smoking chimney which stood beside the leaf-high trees and the four figures beside the frightened big-eyed cat.... our family for this little boy of ours when he was five years old and still held a knee-high vision of the world around him.

I am left now a white-haired decipherer of a crayoned many-folded map, yellowed, dry, while our son collects his own drawings from his tiny artists...the images, in waxy colors showing a joyous series of sunny family scenes, facing front, always, and smiling into some distant camera, fixing forever, a magic box of time when what they see, is all there is.....

June Zaner

Phillip Seymour Hoffman dies on the morning of the Super Bowl.....

© by June Zaner, February 3, 2014-3-2014

I have heard there exists a group of men who eat the dried blood of the entire crop of last year's blackbirds.....this saddens me.
They feed silently on roasted tips of sparrow wings, suck marrow from the pigeon's breast and haunt the black night for eagle's nests to heap hearts, still beating, on their plates.

These same men divide the world into teams, put them into helmets fashioned from monkey skins and toss them a ball to play with.....they did this yesterday and do it on almost every Friday night, as we cheer, and drink, and eat strong meats with mustard, until bones are broken open and blood is spilled and only then we learn that, with a needle still in his arm, a gentle actor dies from too much feasting, too much drama, too much of life.

Richard Zaner

Birds

Some birds just look like that:

 Pigeons perhaps, or wrens With thin penciled wings, light Tendrils waving gracefully below Closed beaks, slight heads cocked for flight Feathers spread, wings hung as if There were no need of wind or even Air to billow hollow bones.

Aloft! These birds fly! Leaving Their peculiar stains, their simple Marks below, droppings flung from Seven-storied perches, any narrow stone Or wooden ledge enough to post Them as they contemplate the scene Beneath: strange birds, they carouse
 The skies, eyes alert and lean:
Centurions of trash and other human things!

© R. M. Zaner, ver 2, 2/4/2014 (ver 1, 2001)

Richard Zaner

Outcropping Of My Life

Stuck in my memory like a shrub growing from the side of a rocky canyon wall—it just stands there, stark snapshot yet diaphanous. At times it becomes lodged in a moment of time along with other moments, before and after, after and before, phases of time’s streaming currents, bringing with them odd and compelling notes; this one in particular:

How I once ceased to breathe, clinically died, so I was told, from acute food poisoning. I had, it seems, thrown rocks at a tree to bring down its fruit—split, green and unripe as myself. I ate a lot, so my Mother said, became extremely ill, threatening lasting neural system damage, some said. I was taken as fast as our rickety ’31 Ford would go, to the nearest hospital, forty miles away, where I died, until a nurse brought me back into life, with just her hands busy on my tiny chest, without the aid of fancy technology.

The mystery of that event, rare and furtive as an inscrutable rune, my clinical death is oddly bizarre, think about it, present to me now only as the merest murmur of a memory—an allusiveness that insinuates even while it still shuffles about within my life.

--© 2014, R. M. Zaner

Richard Zaner

Repetitions

I once upon a river etched in dust Came and stood in silence there Before the dry, once-rhythmed ribs of sand Proceeding each by each in solemn grace Like old ones holding, hand in hand,
The final moment when a flute of wind, Sweeping down the breathing river, Breaks between the buried weed
And the further reach of the sea.

Unbound from time, the usual move of things,
The sun beat hard on the unmoving river; Spilled it with busy shadows
From a hawk's slow-circling wing,
The river then seemed as if remembering The angry rains which like a hurried hell Would rip across this place from which my hand Now gathers dust and vagrant seed.
I then watched my hand move out and trace Those unused currents, held mutely now, Poignant memory of how a troubled word Murmured in the night is forever said but once.
Suspended and alone, my hand held the river
In a palm of sand and knew its touch, Its birth, and threading sand, moved on and knew The dry, inevitable death of dust:

And in the quiet of the moment grew in my hand
The sudden green of a living reed.

The 20th Annual Beall Poetry Festival
March 26-28, 2014

Andrew Hudgins, Valzhyna Mort, Christian Wiman, Ronald Schuchard

Wednesday, March 26

3:30 p.m., Carroll Science, Room 101
Student Literary Awards

6:30 p.m., Bennett Auditorium Virginia Beall Ball Lecture in Contemporary Poetry: "In the heartland of the ordinary": Seamus Heaney, Thomas Hardy, and the Divided Traditions of Modern and Contemporary Poetry," Ronald Schuchard

Thursday, March 27

3:30 p.m., Bennett Auditorium
Poetry Reading by Valzhyna Mort

6:30 p.m., Bennett Auditorium
Poetry Reading by Christian Wiman

Friday, March 28

3:30 p.m., Carroll Science, Room 101
Panel discussion with participants

6:30 p.m., Bennett Auditorium
Poetry Reading by Andrew Hudgins

All events are free and open to the public. For more information, call (254) 710-1768
